Late 18th Century Black Painted Oak Baroque Secretary Bureau

Late 18th century Danish secretary crafted primarily in oak with pine drawer construction, featuring traditional Baroque carving and an elegant serpentine lower section. The substantial bureau has been given a newer black painted finish, lightly distressed to reveal areas of natural wood beneath and complement its centuries-old character.

The drop-front desktop features decorative carved paneling and opens to rest on two extending support arms, creating a practical writing surface. Inside, a contrasting blue painted finish with subtle white mottling and undertones adds a beautiful touch of color to the interior. Six petite drawers are arranged around a central interior cabinet, which opens to reveal additional small drawers for organizing writing materials and personal belongings. The lower right interior drawer features divided compartments, providing further organization.

Below the writing compartment, a slender upper drawer rests above three substantial serpentine drawers, offering generous storage. The bureau is supported by traditional bun feet, completing its stately silhouette.

Two keys are included for use as pulls only, as the original locks are no longer functional.

Originally constructed in two sections, the secretary has since been secured into one solid piece. Signs of age and use include scratches, nicks, old cracks, and age related separation around corners, seams, and areas where the original sections meet. The newer black painted finish softens the appearance of some of these imperfections while preserving the character of the piece.

Restored, stable, and ready to use. A striking example of late 18th century Danish craftsmanship, combining decorative Baroque carving, a contrasting blue writing interior, and generous drawer storage.
